Process of Fossil Fuels

1 Oil extraction has been going on since Roman times. Before the 20th century, oil products were generally burned. Until the early 1900s, finding oil and gas was largely a matter of luck. Early explorers looked for oil seeps at the surface. Systematic extraction of oil only really began in the 20th century. Modern oil geologists can detect the smell of hydrocarbons using sensitive electronic noses called sniffers.

Extraction methods vary from place to place but all, generally, involve drilling a hole. The deeper the hole, the older the oil becomes. Oil and natural gas mixed together make petroleum. Heating separates the lighter components from the heavier ones. Kerosene, petroleum and diesel all break down at different temperatures. Oil muds are heated to separate different fossil fuel components in a process called cracking. Cracking does as an industrial process what geology does as a matter of time.

The Evolution of Technology

Read the first line. What does "brick-like" mean?

Years ago, people used to communicate by simple, brick-like mobile phones which were bigger, more resistant, and with buttons. Nowadays, people have smartphones, which keep them updated but are more sensitive and harder to use.

Nowadays, children like to stay for hours in front of a computer or TV and play computer games. Most of the games appear violent. In the past, children loved toys, played games, and enjoyed their childhood outdoors.

Years ago, most things were made by human hands. In time, things have changed because robots are doing more of this work.

Our grandparents used to watch black and white images on TV. Nowadays, on our smart TVs, we can see images almost like we see them with the naked eye.

Reading a book meant keeping the book in your hands, feeling the soft pages, and smelling the special fragrance. Well, nowadays, things have changed. People can read e-books thanks to a smart gadget.

Think about why technology evolves. What are your thoughts on the changes?
